Tomorrow Paulie and I will point the Pathfinder toward Branson. We are headed out to the next stop on the Equal Justice Tour. We will join with others from around America to call for Equal Justice.

Coach Dave Daubenmire wrote about it in his column published today on News with Views. It is titled "It is Time to See Some Perp Walks."

Earlier this year the Coach drove to Hillary Clinton's house. It was an eight hour drive for him from his home in central Ohio. The Holy Spirit told him to go. He called me on his way. That was the first time I'd heard about the idea. He wanted me to make sure the LIVEstream he planned on producing on the street in front of her house made it onto his website.

So I was on the ground with him, so to speak, as he stepped outside the comfort zone. And that's all it was — stepping outside a comfort zone. I'm ashamed to admit now that my heart was thumping and I was scared at the time. It was irrational. But it was real. And all he and I were doing was stream a video on the internet from a public street. We weren't storming a pill box, or jumping on a grenade. This is not at all like war. It is just politics. But it is getting real.

Fear is real and powerful.

A news report this week pointed out that one in five job applicants are being turned away from jobs because of internet searches. Employers are checking Google and Facebook, of course, and making their determinations based on what they are able to learn about a prospective employee's personal/political profile online. We've all known this is happening, but for some reason we've believed Facebook's lie that they provide privacy with their incoherent and impossible "privacy settings."

So we know that the sort of action Coach and I engaged in that day costs us a job. That isn't jumping on a grenade. But not having a job is a serious matter. It is essential to be able to eat and plug in to the civilization in which you live. It is now unwise for a young person to practice free speech. One commentator I watch ordered young conservatives to remain anonymous on the internet. He advised using the internet as a "normie," meaning to pretend you support the Left on the internet while you hold a job in their "utopia" and secretly slip funds to the good guys. It has literally come to this.

I don't think old folks like Coach and me should hide. But I agree that young people must. Old folks have a duty to stand publicly. They will answer for their cowardice on judgment day. Many young people are standing, and they are losing all they've built online. Imagine investing five or ten years of your creative blood, sweat and tears on a website or social network profile/channel and having it just disappear overnight. It would be like becoming dependent for your daily bread on a small business and having it burn down without any insurance or assistance after the fact. It can be overwhelming.

I was building an audience on the internet using email. This was before Facebook, YouTube and Twitter. I was trolled by the Mainstream Media and a deep fear gripped me. The system of the world I'd been taught my whole life evaporated in a nanosecond. The tectonic political shift under my feet filled me with uncertainty about the future, and a deep sense of foreboding and hopelessness. The situation with media, culture, religion and politics has become much worse since that happened in 2004.

But I have more hope today than ever. My hope is centered in my religious principles — in Jesus Christ himself. That has been the case for my entire adult life. It is, however, becoming more real than the fear that silenced me.

I still become fearful when I step into the street holding a sign, or attempt to hand a flyer or card to a passer by. I was raised to be a good listener, to be polite. I was taught to always respect others, especially those I don't understand. The duty to confront evil in the world doesn't rest with the individual — so I thought.

This is cowardice. It isn't rational. It certainly isn't Christian. I don't think I am atypical for my generation of Americans. This docility is now dangerous. Without an awakening and organized demand for Equal Justice America is going to cease to exist.

We are targeting Bill and Hillary Clinton. The fight is not over policy and principles. It is personal. The Left decided many decades ago to make it very personal. The personal attacks are baked into their tactics. Read Saul Alinsky's battle manual, "Rules for Radicals." The Clintons and their ilk have operated that way for decades. Well meaning Americans let them get away with it.

I told a friend in Maine this yesterday on the phone. The fix in Maine isn't more referendums and bickering over legislation. The problem will be fixed when Jezebel Janet Kills (the current Leftist governor) is thrown out the political window and the dogs are left to lap up her blood (metaphorically speaking of course).

Coach Dave was visited in his home by the FBI. He was officially investigated by the FEDERAL government. They needed to confirm that he wasn't preaching violence. For goodness sakes a simple review of his work online would confirm that. Why in the world would he need to be visited by the F ... B ... I!?

He took it personally, as it was intended to be personal by the government. But he didn't respond with a polite nod and respectful silence. He obeyed the Holy Spirit's order to attack. He went to Hellary's hometown. And he led small groups back to her hometown twice in the following weeks.

Bill and Hillary themselves were surprised to find us surrounding them with our "Lock Er Up" signs as they marched in what was once a bucolic Memorial Day Parade. The Clinton's ruined that parade. The Left has pretty much destroyed America. And the right wing of politics and religion isn't any better. They are two sides of the same coin.

People all over the world are rising up. Tommy Robinson will emerge from prison in a couple weeks. The battle for righteousness and common sense is entering a new phase. I'm looking forward to Branson.
